July 20, 2015

Karen Humes
Chief of the Population Division
U.S. Census Bureau
6H185
Washington, DC 20233
POP.2020.Residence.Rule@census.gov

Dear Ms. Humes,

We at Common Cause appreciate the Census Bureau’s invitation to submit these comments in response to its federal register notice regarding Residence Rule and Residence Situations, 80 FR 28950 (May 20, 2015). To ensure that each district in this country fairly captures its residential population, for purposes of voting and fair representation, we urge the Bureau to count incarcerated people at their home addresses, rather than at the prison facilities in which they are temporarily located. Making this change to the residence rules is fundamental to ensuring that votes from prison districts do not hold more power than those from districts without prisons.

Founded in 1970, Common Cause is a national nonpartisan advocacy organization dedicated to empowering citizens in making their voices heard in the political process and holding government accountable to the people. Ensuring that every eligible citizen has an opportunity to cast a vote, free from discrimination and obstacles, is fundamental to a democracy that aims for and professes representation of all. So too is ensuring that each vote cast is weighed fairly, in keeping with the principle of “one-person, one-vote” announced by the Supreme Court in Reynolds v. Sims. To protect these principles, Common Cause, through its national office and 35 state organizations, advances a number of elections reforms throughout the country, including the elimination of prison-based gerrymandering.

The practice of prison-based gerrymandering is at odds with our principles of democracy. Prisons are typically located in rural – often, white-majority districts\(^1\) - and in many instances the prisoners

\(^1\) For example, 98% of New York’s prison cells are located in state senate districts that are disproportionately White; in Connecticut, 75% of the state’s prisons are in state house districts that are disproportionately White. See Peter Wagner, 98% of New York’s Prison Cells Are in Disproportionately White Senate Districts, Prison Pol’y Initiative (Nov. 17, 2010), http://www.prisonersofthecensus.org/news/2005/01/17/white-senate-districts/; see also Ending make up a large majority of the district’s population. States engaging in prison-based gerrymandering — by adopting the Bureau’s residence rules and allocating incarcerated persons to prison districts — necessarily inflate the votes of their rural, white voters at the expense of those cast by people of color living in non-prison, often urban, districts. The number of people affected by the practice, moreover, is not insignificant. In 2010, non-Hispanic Black men were incarcerated at a rate seven times higher than non-Hispanic White men; it is these typically urban, minority-majority communities, to which incarcerated persons most often return upon completion of sentences, whose votes are made — by the practice of prison-based gerrymandering — to matter less than those of mostly white, rural voters.

When the Bureau first began counting Americans in 1790, the issue of where to count prisoners did not hold the same significance, or result in the same disparities, as it does today. As is well known, American demographics and living situations have changed dramatically over the past two centuries, and the Census has appropriately evolved in response to many such changes in order to provide an accurate picture of the nation. The prison population’s explosion, particularly over the past two decades, requires the Census Bureau to again update its methodology in order to create, as the Bureau strives for, a “fair and equitable apportionment” that reflects “changing living situation resulting from societal change.”

While waiting for the Bureau to make this needed change, a number of states have begun to take action. New York State, California, Delaware, and Maryland have all passed legislation to eliminate the state-wide practice of prison-based gerrymandering, and over 200 counties and municipalities individually adjust population data to avoid the practice when drawing their local government districts. A number of others states — including Oregon, Illinois, Rhode Island, and New Jersey — have also begun considering legislation that would ban the outdated practice of counting incarcerated persons in the prisons where they temporarily remain.

As evident by these state and local actions, states are not legally required to adopt the Census Bureau’s definition of “residence” when allocating individuals for redistricting purposes. However, the reality is that they almost all do. After all, the Bureau provides the “leading source of quality data about the nation’s people ...”, and is best suited to lead the way — and thus guide remaining states — on this important issue. An ad hoc approach on how to apportion incarcerated persons is neither efficient nor fair; votes across districts, and across the country, should hold equal weight. States ascribing to the same definition of “residency” for incarcerated persons makes

---

Prison-Based Gerrymandering Would Aid in African-American and Latino Vote in Connecticut, Prison Pol’y Initiative (Nov. 17, 2010), http://www.prisonersofthecensus.org/factsheets/cu/CT_AfricanAmericans_Latinos.pdf 6 Moreover, Massachusetts cannot easily make such changes to the ways in which it allocates prisoners for redistricting purposes until the Census Bureau issues a change in its residence rules, due to a state constitutional requirement that it follow the Bureau’s rules. The Massachusetts legislature sent the Bureau a resolution in 2014 good sense, particularly since all incarcerated persons share the same characteristic of temporary removal from both greater society and their own homes. Indeed, they don’t partake of the prison district’s roads, parks, or schools; they are confined within that district only temporarily; and, in the vast majority of instances, they return to the districts in which they lived before incarceration. Changing the residence rule to reflect this reality would provide long-awaited guidance to states.

Thank you for this opportunity to comment on your Residence Rule and Residence Situations. We appreciate that the Bureau strives to count all individuals in the right place in keeping with changes in society and population realities. Because Common Cause believes in a population count that accurately represents communities, we urge you to count incarcerated people as residents of their home address.

Sincerely,

Allegra Chapman
Director of Voting and Elections
Common Cause

---

urging it to tabulate incarcerated persons at their home addresses. See The Massachusetts General Court Resolution “Urging the Census Bureau to Provide Redistricting Data that Counts Prisoners in a Manner Consistent with the Principles of ‘One Person, One Vote’” (Adopted by the Senate on July 31, 2014 and the House of Representatives on August 14, 2014).